[01] Generational Conflict Over Japanese Culture in Korea

Generational conflict over the enjoyment of Japanese culture is a significant issue in South Korea. [02] This conflict has historical roots, as Korea was occupied by Japan from 1910 to 1945. [03] Older generations in Korea often remember this time as a period of suffering and loss of national identity. [04] As a result, many older Koreans feel strong negative emotions about Japan and its culture. [05] They see the enjoyment of Japanese music, animation, or fashion as insulting to Korean history and those who suffered during colonization. [06] Such responses may stem from historical conflicts or lingering cultural sensitivities that shape contemporary attitudes toward Japanese media. [07] In contrast, younger Koreans usually have a different perspective. [08] For them, Japanese culture is appealing and exciting, and it is not strongly connected to historical pain. [09] They are interested in anime, J-pop, and Japanese brands, and they view the consumption of these cultural products as a personal choice rather than a political act. [10] This generational divide often leads to misconception and tension within families and society. [11] This generational divide is evident in heated debates on social media platforms, where older users sometimes criticize younger Koreans for their enthusiasm toward Japanese trends. [12] Parents may be upset when their children listen to Japanese songs, or teachers may deter students from discussing Japanese movies. [13] Such conflicts are not only about culture, but also about values and identity. [14] Younger people tend to value individual freedom and global citizenship, while older people emphasize national pride and historical memory. [15] These differing priorities can lead to generational misunderstandings regarding immigration policy and civic participation. [16] Interestingly, the COVID-19 pandemic temporarily reduced this conflict. [17] During the pandemic, social gatherings were limited, and people spent more time at home. [18] This meant that there were fewer opportunities for direct argument or confrontation about cultural preferences. [19] In addition, the pandemic made online entertainment, including Japanese content, more popular among all age groups. [20] The increased consumption of shared digital media during this period allowed for more intergenerational exposure to Japanese cultural products within households. [21] As a result, the generational conflict over Japanese culture became less visible, although it did not vanish completely. [22] In conclusion, the conflict between older and younger Koreans about Japanese culture is deeply rooted in history, but recent global events like the pandemic have influenced how it is expressed in daily life.
